The MONUSCO Intervention Brigade, comprised in Resolution 2098, was created in an attempt to resolve the conflict occurring in the Democratic Republic of the Congo at the time. It is the first United Nations Peace Keeping Force to be given offensive capabilities. The Brigade has yet to be fully utilized due to the surrender of the M23 rebels and their flight to neighboring Rwanda from DROC, and it is now time to reassess the idea. Should we expand the intervention brigade, or dissolve it altogether? As the Security Council, we must decide what to do with this MONUSCO task force and find a solution that will ultimately better the entire world.

As a nation, you must decide what your stance is on this topic. The questions are who will supply the troops? Where will the troops be stationed? Who will train the troops? Should there even be brigades? Additionally, we will discuss the expansion of IB’s globally. Should the Security Council create IB’s in regional centers around the world? You and your fellow delegate must decide whether your country is in favor of the brigade and what will you do to help the brigade be put into action like supplying troops, or offering money, etc.

There is also some debate on whether or not these brigades will be effective seeing as though the first brigade was never tested in action. Is it worth it to take the time and make intervention brigades that will cost lots of money and time for something that we aren’t even sure will work? Also you will have to decide how well these troops from different countries will work together and will there be any hostility towards each other? How difficult will it be to get these different nations to train together with the language difference?

Each delegate must research their stance in relation to their given nation in order to have a successful security council. We hope to have a great simulation and are excited to get started.
